Let's assume the following methods of class A: public void m1(){ ... some stuff Method m2() { ... some more stuff super.m1(); //super.m1() does not exist ... yet more stuff } } Is there a way to call from the superclass instance a method that exists inside the superclass? From the A perspective, there is no way to call super.m1() as it is not defined, but if I get inside the Method m2() then I can make a call to m1(). A: The only way I know of is that you need to pass a new reference of A to m2. Either by changing the method signature to take a A (and let m2(A) just call m1(this), or public class A { public A m1() { A a = new A(); m2(a); return a; } private void m2(A a) { ... some more stuff a.m1(); ... yet more stuff } } A: No, you can't make a subclass call its superclass method, and since there are no virtual methods in Java, there's also no way to make a sub-class call its super-class method either (although there is a way to do the latter, with getSuperClass()). The closest you can get is 3ef4e8ef8d
