In a move that some said could be seen as a power struggle, Medvedev's office announced Friday that he was canceling a planned one-week vacation to Sochi in protest of a recent court decision to ban a concert for liberal opposition leader Alexei Navalny from being held in the resort city. "I do not feel well. Today, I was at home and not feeling well. I went to the airport to fly to Sochi. I got into an airplane and was told that my flight has been canceled. I came to the hotel where I am staying, and I am feeling even worse. I do not feel like doing anything. I am not in the mood to cook, watch movies or read. There is no choice but to cancel the trip," Medvedev said in a statement. "It is not necessary that people know every minute of the day what I do, where I go and whom I see," Medvedev added. A post on Medvedev's Facebook page was later removed. "Regarding the cancellation of the trip, it was not about pleasure or laziness, but a matter of the duties I am obliged to fulfill as a citizen of Russia," he wrote. Medvedev, 56, has been prime minister for about six months. The current head of state, President Vladimir Putin, has long been associated with Medvedev's power base in St. Petersburg, and his relationship with Putin and his inner circle was marked by frequent tensions. Navalny was banned from running for president last month in Russia's presidential election. Some observers saw a potential power struggle between the two leaders, the first time in recent years that Medvedev has canceled a trip. "In this case, we can say that power is being redistributed. It is not clear what sort of agreement Medvedev had with Putin on this," said political analyst Andrei Kolesnikov. "Today, Medvedev is acting like a healthy person," he added. "He 2d92ce491b
