Lactate dehydrogenase isoenzymes in single-cell preparations of rat brain: blood-brain barrier properties and chemoattractant properties. Dissociated cells from rat hippocampus and olfactory bulbs were prepared by gentle centrifugation on a discontinuous bovine serum albumin (BSA) density gradient. In the presence of N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) and serum, dissociated cells expressed the A4 isozyme of lactate dehydrogenase (LDH) and lactate dehydrogenase activity. The number of cells that expressed LDH was calculated from the cell density and the density gradient and found to be between 0.1 and 0.4% of the total cell population. The LDH activity in these cells was significantly less than the LDH activity found in the total cell population (P less than 0.001). The chemoattractant properties of these cells were assessed by a modified Boyden chamber technique. When measured over a range of time intervals, the number of cells migrating to the lower chamber was comparable to the number of cells
