This is due to the combined power of genomics, cell biology and proteomics that allow cell-by-cell interrogation. This wealth of knowledge can be applied to increase our understanding of the molecular mechanisms underlying cancer, to improve cancer therapy and to identify new diagnostic and prognostic biomarkers for clinical use. This work summarizes the achievements of our research group in the fields of cancer cell biology and cancer diagnostics using mass spectrometry-based proteomics. Tumor metastasis is the main cause of cancer-related mortality. Tumor metastasis consists of a series of steps that lead to cancer cells colonizing distal organs, spreading to them and forming secondary tumors. Integrin adhesions, which are composed of integrin α and β subunits, play an important role in the adhesion of tumor cells to extracellular matrix (ECM) and contribute to the metastatic processes.
