To establish the prevalence of antibodies to Chlamydia trachomatis in a population of New Mexican women and to assess the rate of incidence of new infections, a population-based study was conducted of adolescents and adults attending public family planning clinics. A total of 5,958 persons were screened for antibodies to C. trachomatis. A sample of 965 persons were enrolled in a longitudinal study to determine the rate of incidence of C. trachomatis infection. Overall, the prevalence of IgG antibodies to C. trachomatis was 24.1%. The prevalence of IgG among all women was 25.5%, among Hispanic women 25.3%, among non-Hispanic white women 25.1%, and among non-Hispanic black women 23.4%. Using a log-linear model to assess the variation in seroprevalence among subgroups, there was evidence of an increasing prevalence of IgG antibodies to C. trachomatis with increasing age for all women, Hispanic women, and non-Hispanic white women. The prevalence of IgG antibodies to C. trachomatis declined with increasing age for non-Hispanic black women. When the analysis was restricted to sexually active women, the only significant association between sociodemographic characteristics and infection was age for Hispanic women. An additional 469 women were enrolled in the incidence study. Among the 131 women who were positive for C. trachomatis in the screening phase of the study, 12 became negative and 129 became positive. Overall, the incidence of C. trachomatis was 0. 77a5ca646e
