Spindlin, a human homolog of Drosophila melanogaster spindles will be referred to as human immunodeficiency-1-associated molecule-like (HIML) and the encoded protein is called IgT (IgT), an association shared by both vertebrates and invertebrates. The yolkless spindlin gene knockout was found to abolish hematopoietic stem cell (HSC) self-renewal in Drosophila, but not to affect the development of any other hematopoietic progenitor cells. To investigate the mechanism by which spindlin regulates HSC self-renewal, we studied the effect of spindlin gene disruption in mice. Strikingly, deficiency in both V(H)19 and V(D)J recombination, a major step in the generation of HSC repertoire, was found in spindlin-deficient mice. We therefore isolated Spindl1-deficient mice to study the effect of spindlin deficiency on the development of myeloid and lymphoid lineages. Despite the lack of V(H)19 and V(D)J recombination, the progeny of mutant mice showed a significantly lower number of total and chimeric HSCs, but not of progenitor cells. Retrovirus-mediated restoration of Spindl1 expression rescued the defective development of both HSCs and progenitor cells. Interestingly, unlike the homozygous yolkless spindlin knockout, Spindl1 heterozygous mice were born at the expected Mendelian ratio. Further analysis showed that the down-regulation of endogenous himl in cells lacking spindl1 was sufficient to promote the development of myeloid progenitor cells. These results demonstrate the critical role of spindlin in the development of HSCs.Polarization-induced optical switching of the slow-light effect in silicon-on-insulator waveguides.
